Part 2: Description

Overview: This module will give students the opportunity to complete in-depth research into a particular area of law and/or criminology. This will be a chance for students to practise and showcase skills and knowledge that have been learnt throughout the programme. It will allow students to demonstrate a systematic understanding of key aspects of their field of study, including acquisition of coherent and detailed understanding which is informed by knowledge at the forefront of their discipline.

As well as this this module will be an opportunity to reflect upon their progress and consider their future journey after leaving university.

Features: Not applicable

Educational aims: This module will build on knowledge acquired across the students degree programme and allow them to apply this to a current issue. In doing so they will demonstrate a systematic understanding of key topics and issues related to the study of Criminology and Law.

With support from academic staff, students will research and undertake an extended piece of work on a relevant aspect of a topical Criminological or Legal theme.

Typically there will be three themes, at least one of which will involve working on a issue identified by a local partner or organisation. Themes are identified by staff in relation to key local or national issues. For example, knife crime, policing by consent and jury bias are important current concerns that reflect the breadth of issues which may be facilitated through the module.

Students will be assigned to a particular theme and will each produce work that investigates the topic deeply. Collectively this should present views from different perspectives to provide a thorough examination of the issue. The work undertaken and insights developed should add value to the broad understanding of this subject and be of benefit to the relevant communities or organisations engaged as part of the module.

Completion of the project will allow student to demonstrate qualities and transferable skills necessary for employment as well as to synthesise the subject knowledge gained across the degree.

Outline syllabus: The syllabus for this module will vary year on year depending on the key themes identified for study.

Students will be split across topic groups and be expected to engage in relevant learning and research activities related to that topic and in accordance with their supervisors guidance.

In addition the content will cover relevant research methodologies, analytical processes and guidance on how to present relevant outputs.

Part 3: Teaching and learning methods

Teaching and learning methods: Students are likely to engage in a range of different teaching and learning methods on this module. This may include Lectorials, online or in person meetings with external groups and organisations, group work sessions, individual/ group supervision and independent study.

The primary contact time for this module will be offered through group supervisory sessions. This will include multiple opportunities for formative assessment as well as support for directed and independent learning.

The combination of activities will support students to develop a deep understanding of their topic and facilitate them to work independently and, where necessary, as part of a team to generate valuable insights on key issues or topical problems within the Criminology and Law context.

Module Learning outcomes: On successful completion of this module students will achieve the following learning outcomes.

MO1 Articulate an in-depth understanding of a topical criminological or legal theme.

MO2 Understand and apply research methodologies and techniques appropriately and effectively with consideration to their strengths and limitations.

MO3 Engage in independent research while taking personal responsibility for time-management, ethical considerations and academic rigour.

MO4 Appraise diverse views and perspectives and consider the challenges and opportunities these can create.

Hours to be allocated: 300

Contact hours:

Independent study/self-guided study = 262 hours

Face-to-face learning = 38 hours

Total = 300
